Sonnets. BY B. HALLECK.

To love and be loved again-to feel That one heart beats responsive to our own; To cherish joys that words can ne'er reveal, Gentle and lovely as the dying tone

Of far-off music; to go strongly forth On life's rough journey, girt with Woman's love, And woman's truth, jewels of priceless worth, That sorrows dim not, trials can but prove; To stand with her beside the shrines where he

Our household gods-to feel her true hand press Our own in silence, while within her eye Glistens the tear of holy tenderness; To listen to a voice whose every tone Tells us, that we on earth are not alone.

To see the worm feed on the pallid cheek, Where shines the star presaging swift decay; To tremble with a fear we may not speak; To bid adieu to hopes declining ray; To know that she we love and prize must die, Even in the opening of her spirit's dream-That the deep love that flashes from her eye, Is doubly bright with life's last bectic gleam; To stand beside that loved-one's grave and feel

Life's atter loneliness; to silent shed Tears, bitter tears, o'er memory's waste-to kneel Beside the dwelling of our cherished dead-Sending the bruised spirit forth to trace, Beyond the sky, her peaceful resting-place.

To stand upon life's desert and to know The love ht radiance of woman's eye Is not for us; to watch the flowret blow, That on another's breast must blushing lie; To cast affection on one shrine and feel There's no divinity to feed the flame; To feel the brain throb and the senses reel, Whene'er we hear loved and cherish'd name,

Of one whose heart can give no echo back Unto the voice of our own burning prayer; Whose eye cold beaming on our cheerless truck Serves but to show the depth of our despair, Where crush'd to earth hope perishes in gloom, And memory weeps in pleasure's living tomb.

These are the lights and shadows of man's life, The fretwork woven by the hand of fate With the mix'd web of his existence-rife With grief or gladness; yet around him wait A thousand ministrants, to dry the tears Of deepest sorrow, or estrange the mind

From love's first thraldom, breathing in his ears

Spells more enchanting than he leaves behind. A thousand streams gush forth to sweep away The dim memorials of joy and grief, Beneath whose waves, unseen, unnoted, lay Affection's garlands, withered-flower and leaf-While other gods, Ambition, Wealth, or fame,

From his changed heart a fleeting homage claim. But love, first love, is woman's life-to her No second flame its deep oblivion brings, At one lone shrine a trembling worshiper; Fearful yet trusting, her young spirit clings, Unchanged, unchangeable, that altar round,

Through weal and woe-through glory grief or shame, Till death, whose hand alone can quench the flame, O'er the crushed heart uprears the grassy mound, Should falsehood's hand sweep o'er the living lyre Of young affection, that but once can pour

Forth from the heart its melody and fire, She droops the riven strings in sadness o'er, And like the fibled bird of southern skies, Enamored of its own sweet music dies.
